No. 1 – General Introduction

The Eleued formulation of governance is far different to any current political system in our time. While many nation-states have adopted a model similar to the United States, or a mix of parliamentary democracies, or outright authoritarianism, the Eleued Kingdom – if we directly translated the name, 'Kingdom of the Eleueds' – has adopted a more organic model of governance. Firstly, however, we must understand the historical context of this micronation.

The Kingdom of Eleuedla was formed from a territory in the American state of California, as well as a nationally-similar territory in Glasgow, Scotland. It was originally a dictatorship, but only for a brief time under the Provisional Government. Now, this is not the true original foundation, and its political philosophy has evolved over the years. It was said of the original Republic that it failed due to 'the Congress' lack of activity'. Due to this failure, the acting President at the time, who remains King today, Elije Avgustyn Obërholtz-Lejal, dissolved the government and established monarchical rule in the nation-state, then called 'Ninjago' or 'Ninjasus'.

The states at this time were all in California and were titled thusly: Curia Ninjoa, Oniya, and Jedio. The territory formerly known as 'Lilyland' declared independence early on after a criminal dispute and gained their independence following a treaty of the same name. After this military failure, new territories were created, namely Catshire and the Fallen Tree Colony. During this time, a new formulation of Council Democracy formed to advise the Emperor.

Nevertheless, the Emperor became stressed and subsequently allowed the states to become independent and the Empire was formally dissolved. A few days later, however, he began to crave political life once more and founded the Imperial States of Forestria. During this, the Empire also expanded much farther and it briefly entered a union with the Kingdom of Oniya. It also established many relationships with foreign nation-states around the world that influenced its own politics and established long-lasting friendships. The Empire was dissolved later and remained so for almost a year.

The Forestrian period led to an even more confederal state of affairs than the original Empire did. A Constitution was planned, during the period of the political union, to form a Swiss-style direct democracy for the states. While it was never enacted, it did influence later political theory and it led to Obërholtz-Lejal to investigate far more into foreign constitutional theories.

All these periods of history influenced the modern formulation of governance, either directly or indirectly. Directly in the case of the autonomy of the states (and their powers to wage war against each other which de facto continues to exist), the advisory forms of democracy; and indirectly by guiding Obërholtz-Lejal to investigate government systems and political theory. During the period micronational retirement, between the dissolution of Forestria and the foundation of Eleuedla, Obërholtz-Lejal investigated far more into economic theories and Catholic theory.

Concerning the development of the Modern Constitution and Foundational Theory

As proposed in the last issue, the Eleued source of law is far different from the West. The modern legal systems of the West, to an Eleued, are fraught with errors regarding justice, charity, philosophy, and other matters. While the West cites the authors of the 'Enlightenment', the Eleued system relies upon a separate corpus of philosophical literature entirely.

Eleued law is based upon the philosophies of the Catholic Church. Here, another point of comparison is to be made. The Eleued government affirms, as Immortale Dei states is the duty of every government,[1] that the True Religion is the Catholic Church. This is not so in the West, and, to the eyes of an Eleued, the public religion of the West is the cultus libertatis, the cult of liberty.

The Eleued State affirms in all constitutional documentation that 'God, the beginning and end of all things can be known with certainty, by the natural life of reason, as a cause is known by its effects, from those things that are made, that is by the visible words of creation and can be equally demonstrated'.[2] Additionally, it accepts Sacred Scripture and Revelation, and holds to the faith of the Apostles, which makes up the body of believers, which is called the Catholic Church.

1 Immortale Dei (On the Christian Constitution of States)

2 Sacrorum Antistitum (Oath against Modernism)

It puts into practice the statement from Engelbert Dollfuss:

> 'The basis of all society, and especially of every society organised on Christian principles, must be the family'[3]

And again, we see contention between the Eleued source of law and that of the new West. The Eleued conception of the State is expressed thusly:

> '... when several families are united, and the association aims at something more than the supply of daily needs, the first society formed is the village.'[4]

Now, Eleuedla is not a village, but a Kingdom, a union and bond of several states. Unlike in the West where one might say that the foundation of society is the individual, the Eleued would say that the foundation of society is the family.

This is not to say that the individual in Eleued society is swept away, of course, not for humans have an inherent dignity by being made in the image of God. The Eleued State, in its philosophies, also denounces the errors of the fascists, which is that there is no value outside the State.[5] This would mean that the State forms a Nation by its own will, which is false, as was shown previously. The unified values of the families, which is the natio, the culture, is a prerequisite to political unification. The Eleued State sits in a middle ground: it denounces the fascists, but it also denounces the philosophy of individualism, and of globalism, and various other modern ideologies.

Here, finally, are the various influences on the Eleued school of law and their uses in it:

A) Aristotle, the works of Saint Augustine, of Saint Thomas of Aquinas, the Holy Scriptures, and the works of the Holy Fathers of the Church as the foundation for general philosophy;

B) The works of Pope Leo XIII and of Thomas Storck regarding political and economic philosophy in particular;

C) The works of Pope Saint Pius V and Pope Saint Pius X in inspirations to discipline and works against various errors, as well as citations to the Roman Catechism;

D) The historical examples of the Holy Roman Empire, of Austria-Hungary, of the British Empire, of the United States, and of the Ständestaat on actual practice, implementations, æsthetic influences, &c.

The various influences of monarchical Portugal and of Swiss Democracy are very little in the 'Royal Government' but particularly clear in the Parish governments, which shall be covered in more detail in a later section. However, the Parish governments have considerable powers and are generally trusted as direct democracies, although it is in theory the father of the family who votes in these governments.

In Eleuedla, the Royal Government is an absolute monarchy, despite the presence of a Parliament. The theory proposed is that the people can hardly be trusted to understand the problems in a far off territory, but rather what is close by. Therefore, the lower one goes in governance, to the states, to the parishes, the amount of democratic procedure increases substantially.

Concerning the Development of the Constitution

As it was proposed in the previous issues, the Eleued Royal Constitution is not merely a created from nothing, but arose from experimentation and further understanding of political theory. It is organic, not only due to that history of development, but also by how the Royal Constitution is understood. It may be argued that the influence of so many inspirations in the second issue is itself non-organic. While it is true that the inspirations are non-organic, these inspirations arose over time and alongside natural development of Eleued political theory. The Eleued State is based and inspired upon older philosophy, theology, and an older corpus of other inspirations, the State itself is rather new. It declared independence from the United States as a provisional government on the ninth of March, 2025.

Despite this youth, it has begun a development of its Constitutional tradition. The first two texts published under what would become the Kingdom of Eleuedla are the Provisional Act on Diplomacy and the Provisional Act on Wartime. These two acts establish the basis of the Royal Constitution, although only the former is considered 'Constitutional'. The latter act is merely 'Pseudo-Constitutional', that is, it had an influence on Constitutional development but is not considered part of the corpus of Constitutional text.

Since the declaration of those provisional acts, on 08-08-2025 and on 12-08-2025, respectively, there have been three additional acts that comprise the Royal Constitution: the Royal Decree on Government, the Royal Decree on State Distinctions, and the Parliament Act (2026).

Unlike the American constitution, and many other constitutions across the World, the Eleued Royal Constitution uses an uncodified constitutional system. This means that the Royal Constitution is made up of many acts, of court case rulings, of traditions, &c. However, unlike the codified constitution of the United Kingdom, the Royal Constitution still requires a consensus to amend it using normative legislation. The Parliament Act (2026), Article VI, §1 states the following:

> 'The amendment of the Royal Constitution, of which shall consist of this Act, of the Royal Decrees 26.1 and 26.2, and of the Provisional Act on Diplomacy, shall require only the prerogative of the Crown and the supermajority of the [States], which shall constitute a two-thirds vote, in the House of Lords in a special session, of which the Crown Prince and the Archduchy of Saint Augustine shall not [vote].'

This formulates the Eleued view of constitutionalism: that a constitution should arise naturally and be continued through tradition, and that it should be able to adapt to the times and situations which arise. Now, this does not mean that the Royal Constitution can simply change its core principles through a court case or the development of modern heresies (of which modernism and liberalism are the main heresies to defend against). This is because the King is to provide the original interpretation of the law or Constitutional act in question, and the context of which it was promulgated:

> 'In trials regarding interpretation of the Constitution, the Crown shall be called directly as a witness as to the original interpretation and reasoning for amendments and declarations.'

A tradition not explicitly mentioned is the right of the States to rebel, whether through means of war against the Archduchy of Saint Augustine, or through means of peaceful acts in trial in the House of Lords, when the Royal Constitution is being violated by the King. This idea stems from the feudal contract, and appeared in the earlier forms of governance.

It is also important to discuss the constitutional drafts and context that came about to develop this system of Constitutional development. There were two drafts made that were planned to become the Royal Constitution before this uncodified formulation was created. In fact, one of these planned Constitutions was thought, for some months, to be the valid Constitution. The main point of confusion that led to this was the final statement of this Constitution: 'Declared on 16:00 of this 50th day of Miss, in the year of Our Lord 2025 and ratified'. This ratification never occurred, and if it had, it would have stated the exact time of ratification. Nevertheless, these documents are also considered 'Pseudo-Constitutional', and do validly comprise part of the tradition of the Royal Constitution.

Present in both of these drafts is the Preamble which presents the goals of the Nation-State clearly. The Preamble begins with a prayer and ends with a reason for independence from the United States of America.

> '§1 We, O Lord, having no good without You, we humbly pray for the whole unity of the Eleued nation and for the protection of the newly formed Eleued State. If this be Your divine Will, grant us this. Though Christ, our Lord– Amen.
> §2 The goals, therefore, of our monarchist and Catholic nation-state are:
> (a) for the promotion of traditionalism
> (b) for the promotion of all to the Catholic faith
> (c) the unification of the Eleued people; and
> (d) the opposition against the errors and evils of modernism and liberalism
> §3 Moving away from secular democracy, we believe a separation from the United States of America is necessary until the day where it accepts the Catholic and Apostolic Faith. We assert our independence from the United States, primarily, and from Scotland [secondarily], as the Kingdom of Eleuedla.'

Here we see the goals upon which the Eleued State is built upon and which all States must accept, as well as the ideas that justified the original split of Eleuedla. We also see a difference between the old political theory of the day and the current political theory which has presently developed. The line ‘until the day where it accepts the Catholic and Apostolic Faith’ implies that the Eleued State and Crown will eventually cease to exist upon the prerequisite that America adopts the Catholic faith. However, in the current political theory, it is commonly accepted that the Crown of Eleuedla can not be dissolved except by the will of God, who provides authority to all governments, and that all human attempts to do so are illegitimate.

Another point of difference between the old political thought and the new is in Title I, Article III, §6-7 which establishes that all rights may be stripped ‘in the case of criminal activities’. Additionally, it states that the State may add upon rights, granted that they ‘prayerfully [discern] Holy Scripture and the traditions of the Catholic Church’. In the modern political thought, there is a separation between rights coming from human dignity and those rights that come from civil duties. Likewise, there are many other differences between the political philosophy expressed in the current Royal Constitution and the political philosophy presented closer to the foundation of the Eleued State.

However, there are also similarities. This is primarily shown in what rights exist, as well as the civil duties that exist. Additionally, we see that the line ‘[it] is the duty of all citizens to change the government if it commits evil’ implicitly preceded the right of rebellion present in the traditions of the modern Royal Constitution.
